Recommended Reading for Understanding Energy and Spiritual Healing

By Michelle McLemore

The World Health Organization defines healing not solely “on the absence of disease, but a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being.” This aligns with most wellness and energy practitioner goals who strive to discover the imbalance across physical, mental, emotional, and sometimes spiritual aspects of one’s life in order to identify the true origin of disease. Then, they guide the client to bring balance back into his or her life, often clearing the malady. Examining the language history of “energy healing” reveals an amalgamation of cultural beliefs: Greek root energeia (energy + work), German term heilin (whole), helig (holy), and related to old English terms hael (whole), haelen (heal) and halig (holy). Ironically, the healing modalities that some call “alternative” or “complimentary” are actually the original and oldest health interventions.

Are you interested in exploring healing research studies, case studies, and personal experiences? Consider the following four texts.

The Body Electric: Electromagnetism and the Foundation of Life. By Robert O. Becker, M.D. & Gary Seldon, William Morrow & Co. Inc., 1985. 365 pages.

Concepts: The book traces the author’s experiments regarding electromagnetic fields for healing through implants and the body’s natural desire to selfheal. The author’s experiments medically explain how electromagnetic fields can influence tissue and growth. The author’s systematic use of magnets and exploration of limb regeneration is logically presented. This directly parallels subtle energy therapy techniques in which practitioners direct energy in the electromagnetic fields to induce, or accelerate healing, or clear disturbances to allow healing.

Healing Words: The Power of Prayer and the Practice of Medicine. By Larry Dossey, M.D. Harper San Francisco, 1993. 291 pages.

Concepts: Dossey pulls from controlled healing research studies and testimonials. He explores the implications which arise from remote and on-site intentional healing via prayer, meditation, as well as energy healing modalities. Sending healing backward in time, to cells, animals, and humans cancels the common dismissive argument of placebo effects.

Coyote Healing: Miracles in Native Medicine. By Lewis Mehl-Madrona, M.D. Ph.D. Bear & Company, 2003. 233 pages.

Concepts: Mehl-Madrona uses a reader-friendly voice to simplify the key principles used in Native American healing. For specifically miraculous cures (which he says native healers expect and prepare for) he includes 100 specific cases that were deemed unresponsive to Western medicine practices, yet who responded to holistic indigenous methods. Additionally, he encourages readers to explore purpose, meaning, and acceptance in their own healing journeys. He also highlights another kind of healing—emotional and spiritual serenity when a physical cure is not realizable.

We Don't Die: George Anderson's Conversations with the Other Side. Joel Martin and Patricia Romanowski. 1989.

Concepts: Is this really it? How each person answers that question will impact their daily life choices and healing potential. We Don't Die shares transcripts from Anderson's intuitive readings. Anderson's mediumship skills have been tested by scientists more often than any other psychic. The book documents a variety of readings in which he reveals specific information identifying spirit source to his listeners and in doing so, provides emotional and spiritual healing for the still earth-bound family members and friends. Exploring the concept that energy consciousness of the body never ceases to exist adds comfort as well as more exciting questions to ponder for this lifetime.

Musician Spotlight with Emily Slomovits

By Michelle Wilbert

How did you get into music?

I grew up watching my dad and uncle (the group Gemini) performing and rehearsing all the time, so of course they were a huge part of my musical development. My mom also has terrific musical taste, and she introduced me to some of her favorite artists – the Beatles, Joni Mitchell, Carole King, and more. Later, I discovered a love of classical, jazz, klezmer, musical theatre and many other styles of music that have influenced me a great deal.

In terms of playing music, that started fairly early on too. One of our next-door neighbors, Anne Ogren, a member of the Ann Arbor Symphony, taught violin for many years, and I'd hear her giving lessons through her open window in the summertime. When I was seven years old, I said to my parents, 'I want to do that!'. Being the supportive, artistic people they are, they took me to Anne, and I began violin lessons. I started joining my dad onstage just a year later, and added singing and guitar to the mix in middle school and high school.

What are your favorite aspects of live performance?

There's such a special energy between performer and audience. Rehearsing or just playing music by myself or with others brings me tremendous joy, but the electricity in the room when I'm performing for people is one of my favorite feelings in the world. The spontaneity, the give and take, the knowledge that no one knows exactly what's going to happen... It's absolutely a collaboration every time, and one that I treasure.

What have you been doing during the pandemic?

Since the beginning of the pandemic, I've been living with my parents, and my dad and I started doing small, five-song Facebook Live concerts a couple times a week. My uncle Laz did many Facebook shows as well, from his house, and it was a terrific way to grow our repertoire and continue to connect with people regularly while there were no in person concerts to play. In total, between our two households, we ended up playing almost 200 mini concerts!

I also got to collaborate virtually with Billy King, a wonderful musician and friend. With help from his brother Kenny's tech wizardry, we've released several videos in the past year, despite not seeing each other in person until about a month ago! We're getting ready to do our first live show since February 2020.

As I adjusted to the world of Zoom, I did several virtual theatre productions and play readings, and that was a lovely way to do theatre in some capacity. I also read Shakespeare with a group of lovely friends on Zoom every Saturday for several months, and we worked through his entire canon! I'm actually in rehearsals for a virtual show right now – called She Kills Monsters with Center Stage Jackson. Performances run July 23rd-August 1st. For tickets and more information, please visit centerstagejackson.org.

In addition to music and theatre, I've been teaching violin, voice, guitar, ukulele, and theatre in both private and group settings for many years. During the pandemic, I shifted my lessons to Zoom, and teaching ended up being the majority of my work this past year. I feel so lucky to be able to still do some part of what I love to do during this incredibly fraught time.

What is your guiding philosophy of life and art?

For me, life and work in the arts are very intertwined. I strive to give every part of my life -- especially my work as a performer and teacher -- the same commitment and intention: to connect and build community with people in ways that are joyful, healing, and enriching. My goal in everything I do is to spread love, encouragement and kindness, and lift people up!

The King Family — Half a Century of Farming, Making Music, Teaching Yoga, and Building Community

By Sandor Slomovits • Photography by Mary Bortmas • Editorial help from Emily Slomovits

The King family has been a prominent presence in the Ann Arbor and Southeastern Michigan community in a myriad of ways—as farmers, musicians, teachers, and more—for nearly fifty years. The roots of the King family and their Frog Holler Farm go back to 1971, to the founding of the Indian Summer restaurant in Ann Arbor. That’s where Indian Summer’s co-founder, co-owner, and head cook, Ken King, met Cathy Munkholm. Cathy had been hired to make salads at the restaurant and worked alongside Ken, chopping vegetables.

The organic food and locally grown movements, ubiquitous now, were brand new in '72. Frog Holler was the first organic farm in the area and grew out of Ken and his Indian Summer partners' decision to grow their own vegetables for the restaurant. "Even at that early time, before 'local produce' was a buzz word, they just didn't like the idea of those boxes of produce coming in from California," says Cathy King. They began looking for land and found an old abandoned piece of property in the Irish Hills (Brooklyn, Michigan), where there had once been an orchard. As the group started to separate into two entities, the restaurant and the farm, Cathy remembers that "Ken discovered an affinity for whatever this was, trying to grow things, even though there wasn't really anything here yet."

Both Cathy and her son, Billy, are soft-spoken, but their eyes light up when they talk about the farm. Was farming a steep learning curve? "We're still learning," says Cathy, laughing. Farming wasn't what she had planned on doing when she was younger.

When she talks about growing up in Grosse Pointe, Billy jokes, "Vibrant farming community in Grosse Pointe?" (Laughter). Cathy started farming only after beginning a journalism degree at Northwestern, returning to Michigan after the passing of her father, and finishing with a liberal arts degree at the University of Michigan. Billy marvels at his dad's ability to learn on the go. "He didn't know anything, right? He just kind of figured it out. I don't know how that was even possible, but he somehow figured out how to make it work."

Sandor Slomovits: What was that like, deciding to leave the relative safety of steady jobs and sharing the responsibility of running Indian Summer with other people, and then having to be responsible for it all?

Cathy King: You know, Ken thought that this land was a great growing area, that we should grow our own food for the restaurant. Which was a crazy idea, but it was the early seventies and people still had a lot of crazy ideas. The group [that ran Indian Summer] founded the farm in order to grow produce for the restaurant. So, it wasn't scary to make that decision because there was going to be this connection of restaurant and farm; the restaurant would support the farm. Then it became obvious that you can't develop a farm out of an abandoned piece of land. There was nothing here except the natural beauty of the land. There was no electricity, no well, no equipment, there was nothing, no experience, except Ken had always had a garden.

You couldn't do both (farm and run the restaurant). Ken became drawn to the farming and felt he had to give up his involvement in the restaurant. He never expected the person who ended up with the most shares in the restaurant to sell it. But that's what happened. So, then we really were on our own, [because] we didn't have the restaurant buying anything that we grew. The partners all fell away and it was just Ken and I here, and we were too committed to not do this. But there were some lean years, let's say.

Sandor Slomovits: Tell us about those lean years.

Cathy King: We really didn't know what we were doing. When the restaurant was supporting the farm, we were able to put in a well, so at least we had a well, and could buy a tractor. But the land was so undeveloped. It was just wild. We were hacking away at tree stumps and living really simply. I mean, we lived in the cabin and...

Sandor Slomovits: Was the cabin already there?

Cathy King: Yes. It was built by the people we bought the land from, Dr. Robert Gesell and his wife, Cora Lees. He was a U-M professor, they lived in Ann Arbor, and this was their retreat. They were conservationists and Dr. Gesell, in 1952 publicly came out against vivisection for research. That indicated their attitude toward life, people, justice for animals, and the earth. We felt like we didn't just buy a piece of land. We sort of made an agreement to take care of the land and the animals.

The land was really special. It was far from Ann Arbor, and we were driving back and forth to the restaurant, back to this no electricity place. [We lived] in the cabin, trying to figure out how to make a fire and warm ourselves up, and then go back to the restaurant in the morning. It sorted itself out. It was a relief to stay here, but we were always sorry that it meant the end of Indian Summer, which was a lovely institution.

Sandor Slomovits: When did it end?

Cathy King: It might have been '76. It didn't last very long. That's why it was named Indian Summer. Ken named it that, because it'd be really nice, but not last very long. I didn't think he knew how or why it would end, but what he said was prophetic.

Sandor Slomovits: How old were you and Ken in '72, when you moved to the farm?

Cathy King: (Laughter) I think I was 24. Ken was almost 30. He was all grown up. He seemed like he knew what he was doing. He was kind of an elder, he wasn't afraid to try things.

Sandor Slomovits: When did you start bringing your vegetables to the farmers market in Ann Arbor?

Cathy King: First we went to Saline to try it out and that was experience, but it wasn't many sales. Then we started in Ann Arbor on a Wednesday because we were sort of in awe of the Ann Arbor Farmers Market. Then we ended up going on a Saturday with lettuce. We had a very small sign that said 'organic' and the lettuce just flew off the table... it was probably 35 cents, three for a dollar. (Laughter) But we realized that was the market.

Billy King: For many years we were the only organic farm. It still feels recent to me that there are so many other organic farms now.

Sandor Slomovits: Do you think that the people who started organic farms in the area were influenced by you?

Cathy King: I think it was kind of the mood of the times. There was a while, maybe in the eighties and nineties, when there was no interest. Then, in the early 2000s there was Barbara Kingsolver and Michael Pollen, and the interest came back around. I don't think it had a whole lot to do with us except, we were still there. We hadn't given up. Now of course there's much more awareness and appreciation of small farms and locally grown produce.

Billy King: Although it was always decent for us.

Cathy King: Yeah. Well, 'cause we didn't need that much.

Billy King: We had maybe developed a loyal customer base.

Cathy King: But we did press cider, for a good while. There used to be apples on the farm. We thought we could bring them back organically, these old trees that were planted in World War II, but we couldn't. So, then we bought apples. That was like a factory job, driving around buying apples. Ken was working in an unheated cider area in our barn. It didn't even have walls, just had plastic.

Billy King: That paid the bills.

Cathy King: Yes. That was how we could stay here in those early days because we couldn't grow enough to pay the land contract or feed ourselves.

Billy King: How many years did the cider production last?

Cathy King: At least fifteen years, maybe even longer. Somebody heard about an old cider press and we said, okay, we'll try it and Ken sort of put it back together again. It was nothing like the modern cider presses, but it made really good cider. We took the cider to the Del Rio, Seva, Applerose, and we sold it at the market. That was fortunate even though, again, we didn't know what we were doing. When we could stop doing that, it was a big relief because it was very physically demanding.
